The Clinical Education Program prepares 2L and 3L students for the practice of law through a combination of real-world experience, intense supervision, and dynamic seminars.

Students provide essential legal services to underserved individuals in the community under the guidance of clinical faculty.

By engaging in public interest legal practice, students have the opportunity to critically reflect on the justice system, and their role in it, in the context of their development as lawyers.

CLINICAL EDUCATION PROGRAM

Immigrant Rights Project

The Immigrant Rights Project (IRP) is a one-semester clinic in which law students represent non-citizens in immigration matters. Clients include persons seeking asylum in the United States as a result of persecution or a fear of persecution in their home countries, as well as non-citizen victims of domestic violence and other crimes, unaccompanied non-citizen minors, or other non-citizens subject to removal and immigration detention.

The IRP provides a combination of practical legal experience, theory, intensive training, and supervision not available in most traditional law school courses or legal jobs. The clinic also provides opportunities to engage in action, collaboration, reflection, and service that are immensely rewarding and frequently inspiring. It is also a cross-cultural experience. Students learn a great deal about their client’s country and face the challenges and rewards of overcoming the barriers posed by differences of language and culture.

Lobeck Taylor Family Advocacy Clinic

The Lobeck Taylor Family Advocacy Clinic (FAC) is an intensive, one-semester course that offers students the unique opportunity to gain hands-on experience and explore the ethical, strategic, and theoretical dimensions of legal practice. Student attorneys serve the community by providing representation that increases access to justice for low-income individuals and families, as well as advocacy, capacity-building, and systemic reform on behalf of non-profit organizations and community groups. Currently, FAC students handle individual representation cases and advocacy projects.

In addition to providing services to the community, the FAC’s mission includes an explicit commitment to challenging students to reflect on their role in our legal and justice systems. The FAC devotes a significant portion of its case and project work to issues that affect low-income women and children.
